

From: Karl
To: Microsoft ATR
Date: 11/19/01 11:44pm
Subject: Feedback

The course of this trial since the advent of the current administration is a travesty of justice.

There's a major discrepancy in the judicial process's ability to keep up with the fluidity and capriciousness of business, industry, technology, society. Can we somehow make this leviathan motile?

Can the judicial process integrate modern technology to enlarge the "court of popular opinion" for one and perhaps incorporate a "Digital Judiciary," a way that can better integrate new information into ongoing efforts for another?

The Court mishandled an episode that's essentially eons past. Meanwhile, in realtime, the defendant has continued with the same behavior it was found guilty of, and now fully intends to consolidate as much control over the digital domain as they can maintain with their instant tap into the purse of each user.

Don't think I haven't noticed the irony of using the defendant's product to generate my response.

How do you kill a giant Money-Sucking parasite that makes it hosts vulnerable to infections?

Exterminate sounds so dramatic.

Karl Cook